Most of us have these impressions about hospitals. When we walk through the doors, all the lights are on. The floors are spotless, the linens are fresh, and the doctors are eager to be nice and treat us. This is the hospitalized experience, but not all hospitals are created equal. While cleanliness is a characteristic of a safe hospital, safety can also be a problem. The safety of patients in a hospital has long been a concern, but it is an issue that is increasingly being recognized and addressed. Generally speaking, there are three categories of hospital safety: building and infrastructure safety, medical patient safety, and patient safety. The latter two are the focus of this series. Hospital safety hazards and concerns Hospital safety comes from many sources, some of which are: Inadequate patient care Poorly maintained environments Hazardous work procedures and equipment Untrained or uncertified personnel Inadequate communication and documentation Poor record keeping Unsafe events and crimes Unsafe patient practices Medication errors Premature discharge Errors in electronic records Hospital safety hazards Hospital safety is as much about what is wrong in the medical center as it is about what is right. While many of the problems are shared between hospitals, some can be specific to a particular hospital or healthcare setting. Hospital safety hazards include: Errors in patient records, medical charts, and medication records Unauthorized access to patient records Inadequate security of patient records Incorrect or incomplete record entry Poor record keeping Tall stacks of unorganized medical records Hazardous medical practices Error in medical treatment Incorrect, inadequate, or incomplete treatment Medical
